Founded by Surgeons of the United States and Canada, 1913

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1967

John I. Brewer, Chicago (seated left) Abraham F. Lash, Chicago, William F. Mengert, Chicago, and (standing left) Joseph H. Pratt, Rochester, Minn., Roger B. Scott, Cleveland, and Somers H. Sturgis, Boston, were participants in Tuesday session on vaginal reconstructive surgery.

Candidate Group members and Initiates listening to Professor Jonathan E. Rhoads, of Philadelphia, were so interested in what he had to say that they didn't want to interrupt him to give photographer their names. Fifteen distinguished surgeons are holding informal noontime conversations this week.

Cardiac Problems Are Subject at Forum

Transplantation, cardiac problems, and shock were the subjects of some Wednesday sessions of the Forum on Fundamental Surgical Problems.

A silastic catheter, placed in the transplanted renal artery, permits successful intrarenal treatment of allograft reactions with immunosuppressive agents, Samuel L. Kountz and Roy B. Cohn, Palo Alto, of Stanford, reported Wednesday. The technique was applied to 18 patients with survival of 17 up to 13 months. This compared to a three-months' survival of 60 per cent in 10 patients treated by oral or systemic administration.

Increased histologic survival of skin allografts at 10 days has been achieved across the H-2 locus in unmodified adult mice by pretreatment with antigenic extracts, Andrew M. Munster, Boston, said Wednesday, reporting for H. Brownell Wheeler and Joseph M. Corson, of Harvard Medical School, West Roxbury V.A. and Peter Brent Brigham Hospitals.

Increased survival is seen even in repeat allografts to hosts which have been sensitized by a previous graft, the authors said.

to immunosuppressive therapy, Rifaat K. Dagher, Boston, and a group from Harvard Medical School and Peter Bent Brigham Hospital, reported Wednesday.

Counterpulsation decreased the work of the myocardium proportionately in normotensive and hypotensive animals, a study on dogs reported by Jonathan V. Goldstein, Bronx, N.Y., showed.

Despite this decreased work the myocardium of the normotensive dog consumed more oxygen when it was made available by an increase in coronary flow. Thus the calculated myocardial work during counterpulsation is not a good measure of the total demand of the myocardium for oxygen, the authors said. In order to avoid inadequate oxygenation the coronary blood flow must be increased even if calculated myocardial work decreases. This is achieved only by maintaining the aortic pressure at normotensive levels.

The investigators working with Dr. Goldstein were John A. Dormandy, David C.

Kripke, and Robert H. Goetz, of Albert Einstein College of Medicine.

An experiment demonstrating that attempts to find a more permeable membrane for the pump-oxygenator depend on an effective means of dealing with the boundary layer phenomenon was described Wednesday by M. M. Illickal and a group from the University of California at Los Angeles.

Design Prototype Oxygenator

They designed a prototype oxygenator on the assumption that the boundary layer of stagnant blood adjacent to the membrane, not the membrane itself, is the impediment to oxygen transfer.

Using a membrane oxygenator, veno-venous perfusion can be performed satisfactorily for prolonged periods, Carl M. Hakanson and William H. Muller, Jr., Charlottesville, of the University of Virginia, reported. Hypoxic dogs, supported for 8 hours, remain hemodynamically and metabolically stable. Changes in the formed elements of blood are not prohibitive.

A technique for revascularization of otherwise inaccessible areas of ischemic myocardium in the dog was outlined by Albert D. Hall and other investigators from the V.A. Hospital and University of California at San Francisco.

Occlusion is prevented in the prosthetic graft by providing run-off into a peripheral arterial bed.

Total mitral valve replacement with autologous fascia lata produced consistently a satisfactorily functioning mitral valve in dogs, John B. Flege, Jr., and associates, of the University of Iowa reported. In dogs surviving longer than one year, the fascial grafts thickened and stiffened but remained functional.

Aldosterone Response Mediated

Aldosterone response to hemorrhage is mediated by a potent humoral agent, it was concluded in a paper by Charles A. Lipman at Wednesday's Forum on shock.

It is not due to the release of adrenocorticotrophic hormone or any other agent which acts directly on the adrenal gland, the group from Harbor General Hospital, Torrance, and University of California at Los Angeles pointed out.

Experimental evidence does not support the current trend toward administering large amounts of crystalloid solutions, particularly Ringer's lactate, during surgical operations, concluded Eberhard Roth, Louis C. Lax, and James V. Maloney, Jr., Los Angeles, of the University of California.

Studies conducted showed that an extracellular fluid volume deficit in man is not demonstrated in man during operative trauma. The authors advised it is clinically prudent to limit administration of water and sodium to reasonable amounts during an operation.
